Finest Quality Fibres

Cashmere

The so called 'Fibre of Kings', Cashmere is unparalleled in luxury, warmth, softness and durability. Cashmere's beginnings are humble. Mountain Goats found in the freezing climates of China and Mongolia grow a downy under fleece of soft short hair to protect themselves from winter temperatures as low as -40°C. This undercoat is Cashmere. The fibre is then painstakingly combed from the goats by nomadic tribesmen. The transformation happens in Scotland where the waters are soft and more than a century of wisdom and understanding of this precious natural fibre is turned into pure luxury.

Camelhair

Camelhair is 100% natural, undyed and breathable. No chemicals are used in the fibre processing. These fibres are extremely soft and warm and comes from the specially bred 'Two Humped Bactrian Camel', which lives and roams the Gobi Desert.

Geelong Lambswool

Only the finest quality wool from the best pedigree sheep makes the cut for Lambswool at William Lockie. These sheep are specially reared in South Australia where the climate is mild which helps produce this world famous quality wool. The raw material is then brought to Britain where it is dyed and spun before knitting.

Super Geelong

Super Geelong is ideal for a lighter weight woollen garment. Super Geelong is 100% wool and is made up from fine micron fibres which come from the very first clip from specially bred Australian lambs.

Handcrafted with Pride

The secret to William Lockie knitwear is in the use of the most high-end raw materials coupled with the precision of the manufacturing process. The beautiful yarn is knitted into garments using frame knitting machines that specialise in producing classic plain knit sweaters. These machines have been used since the early 1920s and the quality of the knit cannot be replicated by any other machine.

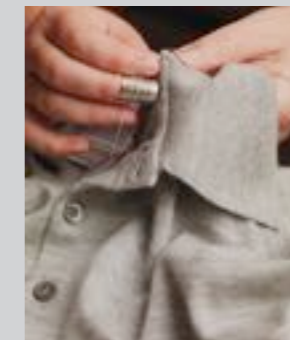

In 1991 William Lockie embraced the newest technology in knitting. The introduction of the Shima Seiki machines allowed the company to produce intricate designs, textures and patterns. Although knitted on these new advanced machines the garment still proceeds through the traditional handcrafting process. The resulting blend provides a manufacturing capability which produces the most complex designs without compromising that unique Scottish quality and identity, providing you with a garment that cannot be duplicated anywhere else.

Once knitted, the handcrafting of the garment begins, the knitwear produced by William Lockie is unsurpassed in its attention to detail with each sweater going through approximately 30 detailed processes until completion. Most of these processes include a combination of machinery and handwork, operated or crafted by their incredibly skilled 125 employees.

The panels of the sweater are linked together using a unique linking machine, providing a durable and quality finish, they are then swift seamed, bar tacked, and hand sewn before they move onto a significant step in their journey.

The washing process of the knitwear is extremely important. The soft Scottish water from the local rivers is used to wash each garment, providing a unique finish. The washing of the sweater can affect the size, softness and wearability of the garment – it is vital it is done correctly.

Once the washing stage is complete, the garment moves onto more finishing, this involves pressing, cutting, collar linking, stitching and buttons, resulting in a significantly detailed and unique garment with a quality that will last for years.

In its final stages each individual garment goes through several thorough quality checks. With the quality of the knitwear being the highest priority to the company and its staff. Each member of staff takes huge pride in their work. The craft, love and hard work that goes into each garment creates an end product that has been handcrafted from start to finish with care and passion.

A Long Standing History

William Lockie 1835-1900

William Lockie was the founder of Messrs Wm Lockie & Co. Westfield Works, Drumlanrig Square in Hawick. When he died in 1900 his obituary noted he “possessed of a great natural shrewdness, and a keen business capability, he rapidly succeeded in building up a large and lucrative business.”

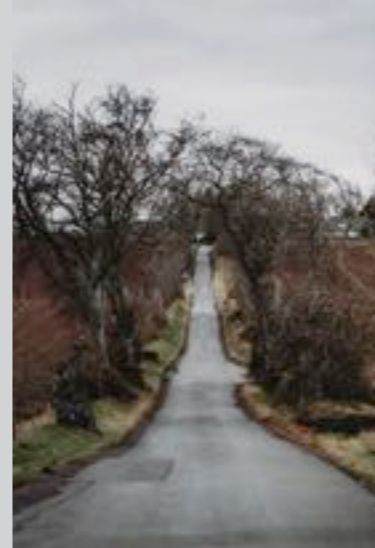

Born in 1835, he was employed after leaving school with Messrs William Laidlaw & Sons in their finishing department. During the 1860-70’s Laidlaw’s decided to abandon hosiery and sold off all of their equipment. This created an opportunity in the market which may have provided the stimulus for William Lockie to branch out on his own account as a hosiery manufacturer in the Fore Row...now Drumlanrig Square.

William Lockie was one of several young men who entered the hosiery trade at this time, and through attention to detail, found a ready market for their goods.

Sadly William Lockie never lived to enjoy the fruits of his endeavours and died on December 11th 1900 at 21 Buccleuch Street, aged 65.

Although married, he had no family and his business was passed to his nephew Walter Thorburn.

It is a fitting memorial to William Lockie that his firm has weathered the take-over storms and recessions and continues to produce high-quality knitwear that is worn and admired all over the world.
